THOMAS PENN,
FOUNDER OF EASTON

"To lay out some ground at the forks of the Delaware.... which I suppose they have done.....I desire it to be called Easton.....and whenever there is a new county that it shall be called Northampton."
—Thos. Penn's Letter to Richard Peters,

THE HON. THOMAS PENN, one of the two proprietors of Pennsylvania, married Lady Juliana Fermor, youngest daughter to the Earl of Pomfret, on August 22nd, 1751. A report of this wedding appeared in the Gentlemen's Magazine for September of 1751. Report of the ceremony also appeared in the Pennsylvania Gazette of November 14th, 1751.

Mention of the wedding is made in a letter to Richard Peters, September 29th, 1751, by Thomas Penn:

".....but first I shall tell you that for some time ..... I had determined on a change of life, and had settled all the necessary points and made visits to the lady, which I resumed on my return to Berkshire, and we consummated our marriage the 22nd of August ..... thus I could not sit down to write but as my grand business is now finished, and I am happily settled with a companion possessed with those qualities that must render a reasonable man happy as well as of a family remarkable for their affection to each other, and into which I have been received with marks of the greatest regard, I shall now sit down to answer the letters of my friends."

And in a letter dated September 8th, 1751, to Gov. Hamilton he says:

"Sometime since I wrote to Dr. Graeme and Mr. Peters to lay out some ground on the forks of the Delaware for a town——— I desire it to be called Easton, from my Lord Pomfret's house; and whenever there is a new county that it shall be called Northampton."

The Fermors were a family of greater social distinction, in the year 1751, than Thomas Penn. They accounted themselves as having had an ancestor among the Norman invaders of England. Their seat was at Easton Neston in Northamptonshire, England, where Sir George Fermor had entertained James I in 1603. At that time Easton Neston was one of the most famous country places in all England. The Earl and Countess had filled it with a collection of antiques, paintings and statues equal to that of the Duke of Buckingham. A description of the estate published in 1758 pictures the house as one of magnificent stone fronted by a handsome avenue of trees. A maze of fine walks wound in and out of the rich verdure which surrounded the mansion. To the left of the house was a terrace with an antique Corinthian fluted pillar with a perfect statue of Apollo on the top. The countryside was visible from the terrace and the Easton church stood close by to complete this picture.

HOME OF WM. PARSONS

"William Parsons rocked Easton in her cradle, and watched over her infant footsteps with paternal solicitude."

—Condit's History of Easton

WILLIAM PARSONS was born in England on the sixth of May, 1701. Early in his youth he came to America and settled in Philadelphia.

Parsons was a shoemaker by trade, and he spent his spare time in the study of mathematics, geometry, trigonometry and surveying. In 1741 he was appointed to the position of Surveyor General of Pennsylvania. He acted in this capacity for a period of seven years, when failing health made imperative his resignation.

Parsons then lived for a few years in Lancaster, but in 1752, when the town of Easton had been laid out and Northampton County erected, the Penns induced Parsons to accept the position of Prothonotary and Clerk of the County Courts. He was also to act as the proprietaries' agent in the maintenance of their interests.

By 1755 the town had passed the experimental stage and had become a rapidly developing project. In this growth Parsons assumed the leading role, a fact which his correspondence with the proprietaries clearly establishes.

It was at this time that there came the wholly unexpected news of an Indian massacre at the little settlement of Gnaden Hutten (now Weissport). The report filled the hearts of the Easton townfolk with terror. All who were able fled down the river to safety. Parsons immediately wrote a letter to Governor Morris, advising him that Easton lacked both arms and ammunition.

But when the letter was written there still remained the problem of its delivery. No man capable of performing the task could possibly be spared. The only available person was Parsons' daughter, Grace. The direness of conditions rendered imperative the delivery of the letter. And yet, struggling against the consideration of the community good was a father's love for his daughter. It meant that he was sending his daughter alone through the savage infested woods upon a two days journey. As yet no roads had been built and the entire journey would be along obscure Indian trails. In the end, however, Parsons decided that his daughter should go, and she willingly abided by his decision.

Late in December, 1755, Grace Parsons set out upon horse-back to deliver the message.

Throughout the long winter the people lived in continual fear of an attack by the Indians. Help did not come and it was supposed that Grace had been unsuccessful in her mission. But in the early Spring guns and powder arrived. The town and the people of Easton were ensured against the fate of Gnaden Hutten, and life soon resumed its normal course. Parsons finished his house and then, finding himself worn out by labor and care, went upon a journey in order to rest and regain his vitality. Soon, however, he returned utterly broken in health and on the twenty-second day of December, 1757, he died. His death occurred just two years after the departure of his daughter. She had accomlished her task and perhaps saved Easton from the horror of an Indian massacre, but for some unknown reason, Grace Parsons never returned.

PAXINOSA

"Lo, the poor Indian! Whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
Yet simpler nature to his hope has given
Behind the cloud-topped hill and humbler heaven;
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold."

—Pope

THE INDIAN COUNCILS held at Easton were the result of real and imagined wrongs suffered by the savages at the hands of the white man.

The first act to crystallize the antipathy of the Indians was the famous "Walking Purchase" of 1737. At a Council held in Philadelphia in August of that year it was mutually agreed that "the boundary should be determined by walking a day and a half in a northwest direction from a point in the head line of the purchase of 1682." The Indians resented the fact that during the progress of the Council the Proprietaries secretly held a trial "walk." This resentment was further increased, when the walk had actually been made, by the action of the Proprietaries in drawing a line at right angles from the point reached (Smith's Gap, Northampton County) to the Delaware River, instead of the straight line that the Indians naturally expected. The line as drawn by the English reached a point far above Port Jervis, N. Y. A straight line would have reached a point opposite Belvidere, N. J.

In 1755, when Braddock was defeated, the tribes which had been hesitating cast their lot with the French, hoping to avenge their ancient wrongs. The Delawares, especially, determined to carry on warfare with such ferocity as to cause the English to sue for peace and promise redress. They utterly destroyed the Moravian settlements at Gnaden Hutten and in the Mahoning Valley. In order to prevent further massacres a native messenger was sent out to induce the Indians to treat for peace.

The messenger succeeded in convincing the Delawares that proper redress could better be obtained by means of honest deliberation than by warfare. Thus Teedyuscung, chief of the Delawares, laid aside his hatchet and presented himself at the first Council at Vernon's Tavern at "the Forks." A second Council was held November 8, 1756, and a third and more important Council was held from July 21 to August 7, 1757.

At the third Council three hundred and sixty Indians, including Teedyuscung and Paxinosa, and representing over ten Indian nations, took part in the deliberations. Teedyuscung was chosen as spokesman for the red men and, speaking with the dignity and fervor which marked him as a man of superior endowments, he pleaded for a home in Wyoming; the erection of definite boundaries; instruction in the manner of building houses; the sending of qualified teachers to the Indian nations; and equitable payment for the Minisink lands. This last question was referred to the King of England, fitting ceremonies were observed, and the business of the Council was finished.

An all night celebration followed, the Indians and the English mixing as real friends. In a few days the excitement had subsided, and men turned quietly to their work, enheartened by the realization that fear of the Indians had become a thing of the past.

—Old Records

HISTORICAL PAGEANT OF EASTON

THE EASTON SAFETY COMMITTEE was the outgrowth of a resolution passed by the Virginia House of Assembly, in March, 1773, appointing a "Committee of Vigilance and Correspondence," and recommending similar groups to the other colonies.

The Northampton County organization was formed December 21, 1774, under the name "Committee of Observation and Inspection." At a public election held in Easton twenty-eight men were elected to membership. The general Committee met January 9, 1775, and selected five members to participate in the Provincial Convention to be held in Philadelphia, January 23.

The Assembly at Philadelphia had not as yet authorized the Safety Committees. They were functioning as extra-legal bodies and yet they assumed judicial, executive, and legislative authority. This complete assumption of power was rendered imperative by the fact that although a substantial majority of the people were fully in sympathy with the objectives of the revolutionaries, the minority, as represented by the Tories, still had enough strength to embarrass the popular cause. The various Committees maintained a careful watch over the activity of any suspected of being opposed to the movement for liberty. When it was deemed necessary an offender was summoned, tried, and if found guilty, speedily punished. There may be some doubt as to the right of the Committees to assume such authority, but there can be no question as to the advisability of the action. The country was practically in a state of open rebellion. The King's courts existed, but without the allegiance of the people. Some form of administration was necessary, and the Committees, although lacking a constitution or the sanction of some higher body, nevertheless derived their authority directly from the people whose pleasure had called them into being and whose affairs they administered.

At a meeting of the Easton Committee, held May 6, 1773, a letter from the Philadelphia body was read. The local committeemen were greatly impressed by its contents, and before adjourning a resolution was unanimously adopted providing for the formation of companies in every township, and advising every able-bodied man to provide himself with a good firelock, a pound of powder, four pounds of lead, and a quantity of flint.

In the meantime significant events had been transpiring. The British Parliament had passed a bill forbidding the unloading of merchandise in the port of Boston. The battles of Lexington and Concord had been fought. The British Navy and Army were seen to be a menacing actuality rather than an empty threat. The feeling of the Colonists had reached fever heat. Action was demanded. In Easton the clerk of the Committee was ordered to send a notice to the members in every township, calling a general meeting of the Committee for the 22nd of the month.

At the meeting of the 22nd it was unanimously voted to abide by and co-operate with the action of Congress; to band together for mutual protection; to use no powder except when absolutely necessary; to encourage military drill; and to consider as an enemy of the nation any man who refused to subscribe to the common cause.

This courage and foresight on the part of the Committee was but the reflected sentiment of the community.

"The nation bleeds where'er her steps she turns;
The groan still deepens, and the combat burns."
—Homer

GREAT BRITAIN was in 1775, beyond question, the ruling power of Europe. France had been beaten in the seven years war, and had lost the greater part of her colonial possessions. In the interval of peace England had become rich and powerful. Against this nation the united American colonies had entered into war and had met with varying success.

The first American campaign was against the city of Boston, which the British had held throughout the winter of 1776. In the spring of that year General Washington considered his forces of suffiicient strength to begin operations. He determined to seize Dorchester Heights and thus drive General Howe out of Boston. For two days the attention of the British was drawn by fire from the American batteries. On the night of March 4, the Heights were captured and breast-works hastily erected. In the morning Howe saw that he would either have to take the works or withdraw from his position. He ordered twenty-four hundred men to assault the position before night. But a storm arose and prevented his men from crossing the bay. During the night the works were strengthened and Howe considered it advisable to leave the city and the harbor.

Washington entered Boston, but very soon withdrew and set out for New York. Howe, with a force of well trained veterans, had landed on Long Island. The two armies met, August 27, and the Americans were defeated and forced to retreat. The Colonial losses exceeded a thousand, and when the first battalion of the Easton Flying Camp rallied the next day at Elizabeth, of the original eighty-seven only thirty-three responded to the roll call. The rest had been either killed or taken as prisoners.

Easton was at this time the frontier of the Delaware River, the center of a large population, for that day, and the rallying place for the patriots of all of north-eastern Pennsylvania. After the defeat of the American forces at the battle of Brandywine, September 11, the patriots of all of northeastern Pennsylvania. After the defeat 1777, Philadelphia was abandoned by them and Easton chosen as the place for depositing the public records and papers, and for collecting military stores.

Over two thousand sick and wounded soldiers had been sent into Northampton County. Every available bit of room was used for the lodging of the soldiers. In Easton the Court House and the old German Reformed Church were filled with the injured. An officer had inspected every home in the town and had placed upon the door of each a chalk mark indicating the number of wounded to be provided for.

Among the wounded quartered in Bethlehem was General Lafayette. Washington was anxious to visit him, both for personal and military reasons. And it was upon this trip to visit his friend that the American leader passed through Easton. He paused in the town for several hours, visiting and comforting the disabled. He also tarried for a short while at the home of his old acquaintance, George Taylor, at the corner of Fourth and Ferry Streets.

"That it is expedient to establish at this place an institution of learning in which the languages, and the various branches of education and science usually taught in colleges, together with the French and German languages, civil and military engineering and military tactics shall be taught."

—Founders' Resolution

IN 1755 the first school house in Easton was erected. This building, constructed of logs, served also as a place of worship for the various denominations represented in the community. Easton, in this matter, had followed the general custom of the early settlements. As soon as homes were built a place of study was provided.

For a number of years the little log building answered the educational demands of the population. As the town continued to prosper and grow, however, additional facilities were necessarily added. But there came a time when the citizens realized that elementary and secondary school instruction were insufficient for the proper development of the community. The feeling became general that Easton should have an institution of higher learning.

The first organized movement in this direction took the form of a meeting held on the evening of December 27, 1824, at White's Hotel, in the northeast corner of the public square. A considerable number had responded to the notice of the meeting. Thomas McKeen was selected as chairman, and after a full discussion of the matter in hand it was unanimously voted "That it is expedient to establish at this place an institution of learning in which the dead languages and the various branches of education and science usually taught in colleges, together with the French and German languages, civil and military engineering, and military tactics shall be taught."

General Lafayette had landed in New York City on the 16th of August preceding and his progress through the land had been marked by one continuous ovation. It was, therefore, resolved "That as a testimony of respect for the talents, virtues, and signal service of General Lafayette in the great cause of freedom, the said institution be named Lafayette College."

Scene II—Granting of the Charter

"That as a testimony of respect for the talents, virtues and signal service of General Lafayette in the great cause of freedom, the said institution be named Lafayette College."
Minutes of Founders

James M. Porter, Joel Jones, and Jacob Wagener were appointed a committee "to draft a memorial to the legislature for a charter of incorporation and for legislative aid."

The original petition presented to the Legislature of Pennsylvania read: "To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met. The petition of the subscribers, inhabitants of the said Commonwealth, respectfully represents."

"That a memorial has been presented to your honorable bodies on behalf of the Trustees of 'Lafayette College,' located in Easton, praying for an act of incorporation. Your petitioners, believing that the plan of education proposed to be adopted in that institution, in which military science and tactics will be combined with the usual course of academical studies, and a due attention paid to the modern languages, especially the German, will be productive of much good to the students and the public in general; and that such an institution is much needed in this section of the State, pray your the said Trustees, and such legislative aid be extended to the funds honorable bodies that a charter of incorporation may be granted to of the institution as you in your wisdom may deem proper."

SOUTH COLLEGE IN 1850

"How cruelly sweet are the echoes that atart
When memory plays an old tune on the heart."
—Alumni Records

THE REV. GEORGE JUNKIN, A.M., was appointed President of Lafayette College by the Board of Trustees on the 6th of February, 1832. The Trustees then leased, for a period of two years, the farm of Christopher Medler, situated upon the south bank of the Lehigh River. President Junkin came to Easton in March and the regular exercises of the college began May 9. The session opened with forty-three students, most of whom had come from Germantown with the President. Before the end of the term thirteen more boarding students, in addition to eleven day scholars, had enrolled and brought the total for the first year up to sixty-seven pupils.

On October 8, 1832, examinations were given for the first time. They started at nine o'clock in the morning and continued until late in the afternoon. In the evening an exhibition was given in the Presbyterian Church. On October 7, 1833, the third semi-annual examinations were conducted in the college building south of the Lehigh. That evening there was another public exhibition, and the second annual Commencemeint of the college. This gathering closed the third term in the temporary quarters.

Junkin was not at all satisfied with the location of the college, and after inspecting and carefully considering all suitable properties, he induced the Trustees to purchase a nine acre plot on the top of Mt. Lafayette for the sum of $1,400. Preparations were soon made for the erection of suitable buildings, and early in June ground was broken. On the 27th day of the same month Judge Porter laid the first stone.

The building as projected was to be 112 by 44 feet, with a recess of 17 by 49 feet. The basement and the first and second stories were to be of limestone; the third and fourth stories of brick. Six recitation rooms were planned, and in addition, a chapel, refectory hall, stewards' rooms, apartments for the President and the other officers of the college, and about fifty rooms for the students. It was intended that this building should be the most imposing in Easton.

Nine years after the first meeting in White's Hotel, the corner stone was laid. On Independence Day, 1833, a procession was formed in front of the old court house in Center Square. Practically every one in Easton had turned out for the occasion. The local troop of militia, the citizen volunteers, the Williams Township Artillery, the veterans of the revolution, the faculty and the students of the college, and a great mass of townspeople, all joined in the line which, at half-past nine, set out from the Square in the direction of the site of the new building. When the campus was reached the corner stone was laid, prayers were offered, and addresses were delivered by Dr. Junkin and Rev. B. C. Wolf. Following these exercises the procession formed again and marched back to the town. At half-past eleven o'clock, in the German Reformed Church, the Honorable Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, the orator of the day, closed the exercises with a notable speech.

HISTORICAL PAGEANT OF EASTON

"We hail the heroes' safe return
To home and friends again,
And mourn with tears and sympathy
The gallant patriots slain."

—Reception Poem

AT the first news of the firing upon the American flag, in the early morning of the twelfth day of April, 1861, a call was circulated for a public meeting to be held the next evening for the purpose of raising men and money for the defense of the Union. Despite the short notice and the falling of heavy rain at the time named for assembling, the Court House in the Square was filled to capacity. Lists were opened, funds were raised, and volunteers were ready for the march before the call of the President, issued on the following Monday, was published.

In July, 1862, five different recruiting offices were opened in Easton. The heavy depletion of the Union ranks consequent upon the severe fighting of the Peinisular campaign demanded prompt supplies of men. The local papers were at the time filled with reports of Eastonians killed and wounded in the service. Excitement ran high. Recruiting lists, opened at the law office of W. H. Armstrong, on North Third Street, were filled with the names of over four hundred men. In an endeavor to obviate the necessity of a draft, the county offered substantial bounties to all who would volunteer. This movement originated the 153rd Regiment Penna. Volunteers. Charles Glanz became Colonel of the organization; Jacob Dachrodt, Lieutenant Colonel and Howard J. Reeder, Adjutant.

During the entire course of the war Easton contributed its full share of money, supplies, and men. Twice when invasions into the state necessitated special requisitions of troops, the men of Easton responded in excess of the designated number. It is not possible to definitely ascertain just how many local men were in the service, but the records in existence indicate that the number was in excess of what might reasonably have been expected of a town the size of Easton.

When the war was finished and the soldiers returned home, they found the town extending its welcome to them in a genuine and whole-hearted manner. By eight o'clock of the day of their arrival Easton was decorated with flags from one end to the other. Every avenue leading into town was thronged with carriages, teams, and omnibuses, loaded with people from the surrounding country. As the time of the arrival of the train approached, every-one struggled to South Third Street. Many of the country people, in their anxiety to see their friends, crowded across the bridge. At ten o'clock the cannon on Mt. Jefferson announced the arrival of the train.

After the soldiers had left the cars they marched to the South Easton road and formed into line; from there they marched across the bridge and up Northampton Street to the Fair Building. Having passed in review they drew up before the speaker's stand to listen to an address of welcome. Following appropriate ceremonies the men entered the building and sat down to a meal consisting of "poultry and various meats, bread, butter, cheese, etc., with warm coffee, ice-water, and lager beer."

MARQUIS de LAFAYETTE

"I read, I examine, I study, I reflect, and out of all this I try to form an idea into which I try to put as much common sense as I can."

-Lafayette

IT is fitting that the final episode in this pageant of Easton should symbolize the spirit and power of learning. For Easton's band of far-seeing friends of education never allowed that spirit to lag even during the long early years of shadows, and doubts when the foundation of a college seemed to be but a vain dream. It was the same persisting desire for truth that fanned to flame the ardor for learning in the century old universities of Europe.

HISTORICAL PAGEANT OF EASTON

Oxford, according to the Oseney Chronicle, attracted students as early as 1133 while the seats of learning on the continent at Paris, Prague, Bologna, Cracow and Salamanca were thronged with eager students for centuries. Here were taught the graces of the Seven Liberal Arts which included: Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric, Arithmetic, Geometry and Music.

The figures representing the older colleges are to symbolize the learning of the ancient universities which found expression in the new world in the foundation of colleges such as Lafayette. The Seven Liberal Arts and their attendants symbolize the intellectual interests of the old world colleges whose glorious heritage Lafayette College enjoys.

The Marquis de Lafayette symbolizes the signal talents and virtues of honor, freedom and truth with which the great French General and friend of independence was endowed. General Lafayette had landed in New York on August 16th of the summer previous to the founding of the college. His name was on the lips of every child who could speak, as on those of the old man trembling on the verge of the grave. He had been wounded at Brandywine, nursed back to health at Bethlehem; therefore the citizens held he should be honored at Easton and it was unanimously resolved to name the new institution of learning, Lafayette College.

EPILOGUE

"I call, therefore, a complete and generous education that which enables a man to perform, justly, skillfully, and magnanimously all of the offices, public and private, both of peace and war."

—Milton

"To prepare us for complete living is the function which education has to discharge."

—Spencer

"I read, I study, I listen, I examine, I reflect, and out of all this I form an idea into which I put as much common sense as I can."
